

Convince yourself, lie to yourself,

the heat is my friend.
Think of the coldest you've been, think of yourself
as chilled on the inside, hungry for warmth, like you've been trapped in the cold all year

Can it work? Can a person think themselves out from physical pain? Is it nice to sit in the sun at the beach but not in the city? Why? Because we are wearing clothes and shoes? If we weren't would it be better? Would it be better if we were wearing shorts and bikinis walking through the city? Would it be better if there was sand on the ground?
Are the monks walking on coals real?
Are they just faking it? What would be the difference between faking it and not faking it? Are some people too sensitive to the heat? Can you learn to love the heat? Is it easier to withstand the heat when hanging around with people who love it? Who are self proclaimed 'lizards' sun bathers.

from Jonah

-Your goal is to go towards the physically warmest place you can see while walking, follow the heat -Try and consider it like a sauna, a city sauna, find it enjoyable, embrace the heat and the sweat -At the end of the walk, eat a popsicle, pour cold water on your head

-The walk can only take place on a 100 degree or hotter day
-The walk is finished when the album ("Green") is finished -No talking, phones airplane mode
-I leader starts, they lead for about ten minutes in their brain, then pass it to the next person, cycling

Why is the heat so nice in some contexts and not others? Is it because we can open the door and leave? Is it because we've elected to withstand it in the first place? Something about it feels arbitrary, like if I could just flip a switch in my head I could embrace the heat like a sauna

It's been 100 degree days lately (38c) and it has me thinking about heat.
This year I've oddly, and through no planning, found myself in more saunas than I ever have before in my life. I stole a t shirt from the Korean spa in New Jersey, it's very thick, and for some reason nice to sweat into in the saunas. I wear it in the heat sometimes and I can almost trick myself into thinking that I enjoy it because it makes me think of sweating in the sauna.
